1 They have sharp claws

and very strong legs.

I drive the train.
I blow the whistle.
“Woo-woo!”

I climb inside.
The floor is the track.
The ceiling is the sky.

We went to my house
to get materials.

“What can we use to make sounds?”
Alison asked.

“Tons of things
make great sounds,” I said.

“Like these spoons,” Rose said.
She drummed on the table.
“That sounds like music!” I said.

Ridhima began to worry about climate change in 2013 when she was five years old. Uttarakhand, the northern Indian state where Ridhima lives, is in the foothills of the Himalayan Mountains. In June 2013, flash floods and landslides in her state killed hundreds of people and left thousands homeless. Ridhima's family and her home were safe, but that didn't stop her from worrying about others.

“My government has failed to take steps to regulate and reduce greenhouse gas emissions, which are causing extreme climate conditions,” Ridhima told a newspaper. “This will impact both me and future generations.”
