

1. Walks

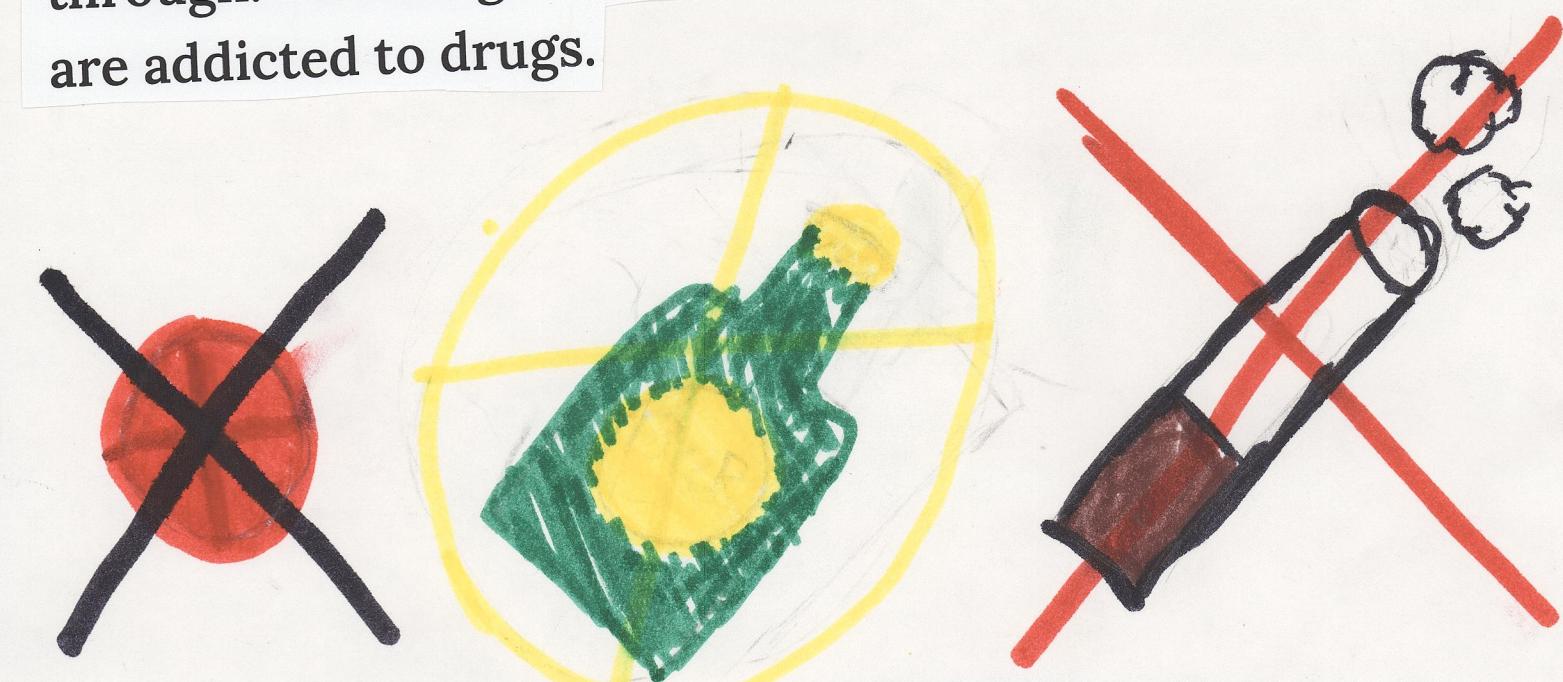

Another thing I would do is take walks around my city and talk with people for their opinions. It would change my point of view as mayor to the point of view as a fellow citizen. I also think it's important for citizens to see that I don't just value the opinions of people in Congress, that I also value the opinions of the people I am in charge of. Another thing is if I knew the neighborhoods, I would be able to see what type of changes need to be made like an excessive amount of litter or the playground covered in graffiti.

2. Addiction

Addiction

Also, I would help people work through addiction. When you are addicted to something, it is really hard to stop taking it. When I go places, oftentimes I see tents on the side of the road, it disturbs the beauty of the setting. If people with drug problems had a therapist to help them work through it, they would be able to lead a drug-free life, it would also be a lot easier to work through. I would give free drug addiction therapy to people that are addicted to drugs.

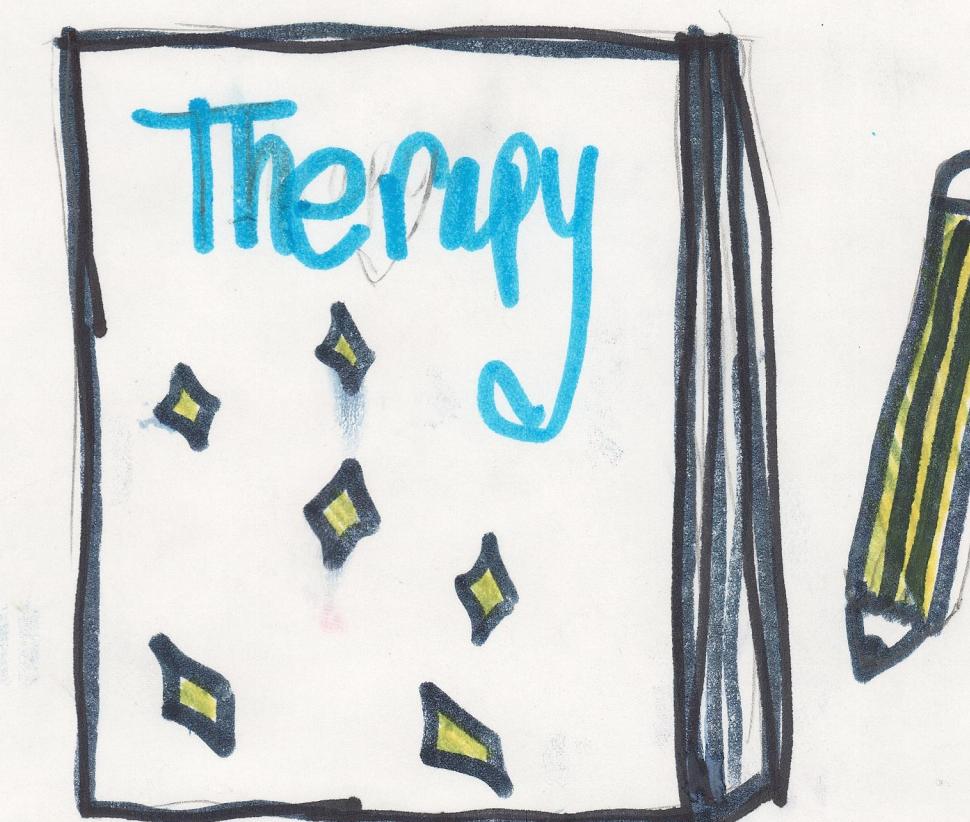

3. Citizenship for all

One change that I would make is to help everyone in my city or town to become citizens. At my school, there are kids whose family members aren't citizens. It's probably very stressful and hard to learn for kids whose families or friends aren't citizens. There are several school-wide activities that have been canceled at my school because people are scared to go anywhere in public because they know that they could be taken from their home and their families.

4. Therapy for Kids

Lastly, I would help kids work through depression and anxiety. Anxiety and depression can make kids feel unsafe or unhappy. At lots of schools, they are cutting counselors to save money. But, if kids don't have access to someone to talk to, school could feel like a burden, not like something they look forward to. If kids had access to therapy, they would have someone to talk to. Having someone that will listen to what you have to say and give advice that could change a kids' life for the better.
